For more than 50 years, the United States has claimed to provide equal public education to all students, regardless of background or identity. But in fact, as income and wealth inequality have become more brutal and entrenched, low-income students, students of color, and students with disabilities have systematically and continuously been deprived of the resources that more privileged students take for granted. This fact sheet describes some of the sources of the underfunding of public schools, and policies that could finally achieve equity for our schools.

Federal Underfunding of Public Schools

In 1965, the federal government passed the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA), which sought to address the need for additional resources for schools in economically deprived communities. The legislation recommended that the federal government provide additional funding for low-income students, at a level up to 40% on top of average per-pupil state spending. That commitment, known as Title 1, has been underfunded every year.

If the federal Title 1 commitment had been met, Denver would have had an additional $82 million to spend on low-income children in 2015 alone. Over the past 13 years — since this year's high school graduates entered kindergarten — Denver schools have been shortchanged $844 million in federal Title 1 funds.

In 1975, Congress passed the law now known as the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, or IDEA, which requires schools to provide students with disabilities with the supports they need in school. IDEA assumes that on average, the cost of educating a child with disabilities is twice the cost of educating a non-disabled student, and Congress pledged that the federal government would pay up to 40 percent of this cost. That commitment was also never been met.

If the federal IDEA commitment had been met, in 2015 alone, Denver would have had an additional $26 million to spend on students with disabilities. Over the past 13 years — since this year's high school graduates entered kindergarten — Denver schools have been shortchanged $315 million in federal IDEA funds.

Investment in Police and Prisons Instead of Schools

Over the past few decades, spending on police and prisons has skyrocketed, along with harsh criminal penalties for minor offenses, the criminalization of normal teenage behavior, and punitive school discipline policies. In addition to the unjust incarceration of millions of people, this expansion of the police and prison industry has reduced resources for public education.

In Denver, between 2005 and 2014 government funds were not distributed equally across spending areas:

- Spending on corrections increased by 33%³
- Per-pupil spending on instruction decreased by 11%⁴

Make the Rich and Corporations Pay Their Fair Share

This is the wealthiest nation in the world—and among the most unequal—with the greatest concentration of wealth in the hands of the fewest people. Every year, decisions are made by political leaders that strip public funding from public education and send that money to further increase private wealth. Newark is no exception. But there are several policies that could generate millions of dollars to achieve equity in Newark public schools.

- Closing the carried interest loophole would raise about $31.7 million a year for Colorado.⁵
- Passing the Great Schools Thriving Communities ballot initiative would raise $1.6 billion for schools.⁶

Our cities, states and federal government have the funds necessary to provide all students with an equitable and high-quality education, but they choose to spend resources on police and prisons, corporations and the wealthy. It is time to take those funds back and provide all children with the schools that they deserve.

Bad Actors

While Denver public schools struggle, the wealthy and corporations have benefitted from tax subsidies and undermined public education through supporting school privatization.

- Wealthy companies that have benefited from tax subsidies more than $3 million include Sage Hospitality, DaVita Healthcare and Dish Network.
- Charter school advocates who have donated to charter networks and/or sit on boards include: Zach Neumeyer, Chairman of Sage Hospitality and Kent Thiry, CEO of DaVita.
